Dear Ms Taylor,

I am writing to apply for the role of Engineering Lead advertised on your website. In short: I have spent twelve years building the tools that let product teams ship faster and more safely.

Good documents are read quickly. A reader skims the first lines of each paragraph, looks for the numbers that matter, and decides within seconds whether to read on. Every sentence should earn its place, and every heading should tell the reader what follows, so the structure of the document carries its meaning even before the words do.

Long paragraphs are harder to read on screen than on paper, so this one runs on deliberately: it gives the layout engine several lines to break, to justify and to carry across a page boundary, which is where widow and orphan control decides whether a single line may be left behind on its own.

A centred line, in red.

Underlined, ~~struck~~, highlighted, and SMALL CAPS with H_2O and x^2.

Yours sincerely,

Alex Example
