A claim that needs a source.[1] Another one.[2]

Good documents are read quickly. A reader skims the first lines of each paragraph, looks for the numbers that matter, and decides within seconds whether to read on. Every sentence should earn its place, and every heading should tell the reader what follows, so the structure of the document carries its meaning even before the words do.

[1] The first source.

[2] The second, a longer note that runs on to show how footnote text wraps across the width of the page.