Portrait section

Good documents are read quickly. A reader skims the first lines of each paragraph, looks for the numbers that matter, and decides within seconds whether to read on. Every sentence should earn its place, and every heading should tell the reader what follows, so the structure of the document carries its meaning even before the words do.

Landscape, two columns

Good documents are read quickly. A reader skims the first lines of each paragraph, looks for the numbers that matter, and decides within seconds whether to read on. Every sentence should earn its place, and every heading should tell the reader what follows, so the structure of the document carries its meaning even before the words do.

Long paragraphs are harder to read on screen than on paper, so this one runs on deliberately: it gives the layout engine several lines to break, to justify and to carry across a page boundary, which is where widow and orphan control decides whether a single line may be left behind on its own.

Good documents are read quickly. A reader skims the first lines of each paragraph, looks for the numbers that matter, and decides within seconds whether to read on. Every sentence should earn its place, and every heading should tell the reader what follows, so the structure of the document carries its meaning even before the words do.